SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 9

Indian Summer. When the hunter's meen is waning And hangs like a crimson bow, And the frosty fields of morning Are white with a phantom snow, Who then is the beaut ful spirit

That wandering smiles and grieves

Along the desorate hillsides, And over the drifted leaves? She has strayed from the fareff dwelling She has strayed from the farcif dy
Of forgotten Indian braves,
And stolen wistfully earthward
Over the path of graves;
She has left the cloudy gateway
Of the hunting grounds sjar,
To follow the trail of the summer

Toward the morning star! There's a rustle of soit, slow footsteps, The toss of a purple plume, And the glimmer of golden arrows Athwart the hezy gloom.
'Tis the smoke of the happy wigwams The reddens out wintry sky,
the scent of unfading forests
That is dreamily flusting by.

O shado a sister of summer! Astray from the world of dreams, Thou wraith of the bloom departed, Thou echo o: springtide streams, Thou moonlight and starlight vision Of a day that will come no more, Would that our love might win thee

To dwell on this stormy shore! But the reaming Indian goddess burs not for our tender sighs-She has heard the call of her hunters Beyond the sunset skies! By her beaming - rrows stricken,

The last leaves fluttering fall,

With a righ and smile she has vanished-And darkness is over ail. -F. L. Macs, in N. Y. Journal of Commerce.
